

At the stationhouse

Summertime is here, and the air's so clear
And people's walking by, and smile against the clear blue sky

At the stationhouse, the conversation rise
As the coffee start to flow, and the wind still slowly blows

I didn't hear a word, the laughter was all I heard
And I realised right there, the plays to be it must be here
By the tables there, where guys and girls all share
A little space in time, to fit into this little rhyme

Then the time is up, we split and go our separate ways

But tomorrow, we are here again

To make the laughter fill our day

Then the wheel it turns, and the sunlight burns
And the time pass by, we look against the same old sky

At the stationhouse, the conversation rise
The same old girls and boys, and I are still making all that noice
